Comments from the Lightroom team tend to be both positive and the co-founder of Lightroom himself, John Nack, also says that Lightroom was designed for usability and features. Lightroom's abundant features necessitate some learning curve, similar to using Photoshop after using Elements for a while. So, if you want to learn how to use Photoshop effectively, then Lightroom is definitely not for you. This still remains my personal opinion, too. Perhaps if Lightroom had more emphasis on ease of use, then it might have had the success it had. Instead, it's a little more accessible, but also a little less popular. How do Lightroom and Photoshop's features differ? Features include the ability to rearrange imported images and a "Photo Browser" that displays image thumbnails on multiple pages. Adobe Lightroom gives us remote control of our pictures through the mobile app, while the free version of Photoshop allows us to view structural edits, as well as multi-page images in Bridge. Both can be nicely customized through their respective User Interface, or UI, as I prefer calling it. Of course, it is the Customization of the UI that really differentiates Photoshop and Lightroom. Lightroom is purely about organizing and managing your pictures on your computer, and Photoshop is a much better image mocker in the sense that it can actually change your images. This is because Photoshop has much more freedom in accessing your images especially in developing the functions. Photoshop is not limited to a specific function. It can come with all functions, particularly the organizing functions. This is because Photoshop has the ability to organize images into a folder. You can have a folder for pictures, an album for pictures and even several albums. Lightroom can only access images that are in its library. Also, since Lightroom is only for organizing and managing, the "Photo Browser" shows you a page of images at a time. Photoshop has the ability to expand the number of pages and the number of images on each page. This is because Photoshop has a more flexible system; where Lightroom is limited to a single page, Photoshop can be up to 256 pages.
