Lightroom is often based on stable and trusted code, with relatively few changes in the last one hundred or so versions. With Lightroom 5, we find several updates that greatly improve the aesthetics of the application and increase its performance. Nevertheless, in this review, I will focus more on the features that improved the user experience. This is done by using the Printer Information panel to verify and adjust the highest available print resolution. The panel also allows you to detect the best setup for your printer. To make this happen, the program automatically "learns" the printer by sampling as many pictures as possible of the same kind and dynamically creating a profile for that particular printer. The Printer Information panel also allows you to view the resolution of the registered prints on your printer, the direction of printing, and even the quality of a print. If you have multiple printers, you will be able to print to all of them at once using this tool. To export a photo into the highest available resolution on your printer, you may need to scale it down for that purpose. This can be achieved by choosing File > Export > Save for Web > High Quality > Scale Down. The same menu-based option can be used to export to various other file formats as well. Pressing the "Share for Review" button allows you to share what you are working on with other Lightroom 5 users or on the web. When you click the Share button you will be prompted to select the recipients of the files. This can be anyone from within Lightroom or from the outside. The light gray button looks like a lightbulb, which is not related to the sharing process. It is the button that should be clicked to share. The others are things that happen when you click those other buttons.

All of the above-mentioned features will make the process of creating content easier and less frustrating. However, if you want to take your content to the next level, you'll want to be familiar with the additional features found in the Creative Cloud subscription. The 8 megabytes per second is too slow to turn a 10 second exposure into a final file in less than 30 seconds. The thing about Mac systems is that they are very fast when they are not slow, only to be slower than an old drum after a sustained period of heavy use. So, I tried it with the USB 2.0 connection. Again, no result. The computer was still slow. I looked at the behavior of the computer when working with Photoshop: Why the lag? It doesn't take a long time to open and save files. It's quick to render, delete, or otherwise edit files. But when I am in the middle of a session, the computer lacks the speed to keep up with Photoshop. To be fair, this requires a fundamental-level change in how Photoshop operates. I looked for the time, and found that the right hard drive could likely move 128 megabytes per second. So, I thought: "let's have a go with the right drive." I hooked it up to my MacBook Pro, and plugged in the Thunderbolt cable. Everything looked as if it was working. But on the right hard drive, I had no video. You might ask: "well, what do you expect? The entire Mac was connected to the right hard drive, not just the video." The company has also unveiled a new filter called Automatic HDR, which enhances photos that have varied exposures. Adobe describes it as: "Automatic High Dynamic Range, or HDR, merges together everything between darker and lighter areas of the image, creating a single result that can work wonders for a variety of photos." With HDR, you no longer have to manually combine exposures.
